THE STORY OF EVA RAY.

I had always loved Frank Barron, and I do not think that I could help it if I had tried. It began when we went to school together. Surely it is better to love than to hate. Gladys Martin was prettier than L. Gladys was my cousin, and when Frank was twenty-two be suddenly discovered that she was the girl be wanted for a wife, offered himself and was accepted.

Now, when I heard that from her own lips, I went away to my room for awhile, and kneit down beside the bed and prayed for my soul. For I felt the most sonable anger and jealousy thrill me from head to foot. And why should I feel so? Only satan fore I ceased to fear that he would die knew, I was assured-only satan. And of sorrow, and I stayed with the chilwhen I arose from my knees I had con- dren. And so another year went by. ered him within me. I was Frank's Then it was spring time, I remember nothing more, and I went to the wed- soms, pink and white. Frank came to me as I sat at work in the shadow of the fing, and was first bridesmaid to Gladys, and said to myself that there were some women to whom love and joy were given and some who had their duties to perwonder if you know how dear you are form, and that I was of the latter sort and Cousin Gladys of the former.

Frank Barron was only a poor doctor, and Cousin Gladys had nothing. But I I could scarcely breathe. was rich, and when they went to the "but I know you will not think that I country town where he was to practice, I went with them. I think some I had made up my mind to be a spinster, thing went out of me when my poor Evangeline was lost—that is, youth's essence. I feel it—and look how gray and felt that I could do a great deal for Frank and Gladys. She was one who am growing! But I long for a dear friend—for a woman's tenderness—for a never thought of the future and could not manage a small income well. I knew. And so it proved. She never guessed— nor did he—how much trouble they wife who will be what you can be to me. Will you have me, such as I am, with my children and my saddened spirit, and all my imperfections on my head?" Would if I dared not speak; but I put my hand in his. I knew he did not

As for me, they knew me as Mrs. Barron's cousin, Evangeline Ray, and I think many thought me a poor one. What did I care so that Gladys and Frank were happy and fond of me? After awhile there was some one else to love—a little girl baby, who soon grew to believe that there was no one else like Aunt Evangeline, and later came a boy. When he was but two years old there was sent to Gladys a cablegram from and, where her grandfather (no kin of mine, for we were cousins on the mother's side, and he was her father's father) lay dying. He wished Gladys to come to him-to remain with him for the few months he had to live, and promsed that if she would be would leave her Duty and interest both called upon her

What should she do? But I had a sound below—a wild cry, a scream of fear, a shout of joy. What had haped the ocean thrice and I knew what to do. I had her trunks packed and all in them that she could want while she was rondering what to do. And I took They were dark. The hall below was fully lighted. Under the blaze of the her to the steamer and left her with people whom I knew who happened to be going on the same boat—as if she were a child. She seemed so young and falswinging lamp I saw Frank Barron holding his wife Gladys in his arms. She wore a traveling dress. His sudden clasp had caused her cap to fall to the ground and all her golder hair to escape from its comb. Living and lovely she stood there ambraced he him. She seemed so young and fair girlish that no one could believe that she had been married so many years, and I could see that she would and I could see that she would enjoy herself for all her pretty terrors, and her last words were: "Take care of Frank and the babies. I wouldn't leave them with any one but you. You are our guardian angel."
